Charity

Charity is the act of giving help to those in need. It is a humanitarian act. It involves giving money, goods, or time and efforts. It is done without expecting something in return. When such people are not supported, they often beg and ask for help from people they do not know. Others may rely on support from charitable organizations which collect money and goods and give them to those in need.

Most charities are concerned with providing basic needs, such as food, water, clothing, health care and shelter. The most common form of charity is donating money. The money is then use to buy these basic needs. However, there are many other actions that may be performed as charity such as teaching orphans, donating blood or money to help fund medical research.

Charitable giving can be responsibility in many religions. This kind of charity is called in Islam “Zakat”. It is one of the five most important duties of being a Muslim.
