Zohra Drif: An Algerian Freedom Fighter

Zohra Drif is a living legend of the Algerian freedom movement. She was born on December 28, 1934, in Tissemsilt, a small town in western Algeria. She was born into a wealthy family, which allowed her to attend the French school and the University of Algiers, where she studied law.

As a twenty-year-old law student, Zohra Drif joined the National Liberation Front (FLN) shortly after the beginning of the Algerian Revolution against French colonization. She was part of the FLN's bomb network. Alongside with other prominent figures such as: Ali La Pointe, Djamil Bouhired, Hassiba Ben Bouali, and Yacef Saâdi, head of the Autonomous Zone of Algiers. Zohra Drif conducted or supported several high-profile operations to draw international attention to France's abuses against the local population and the Algerians' struggle for freedom. On September 30, 1956, she set a bomb in the Milk Bar, a French Café, frequented by Pieds-Noirs: the colonialists. The attack resulted in the death of three young women and the injury of several others. In September 1957, Zohra Drif was arrested and sentenced to 20 years of forced labor. She was imprisoned in Algeria and later in France. After Algeria gained independence in 1962, she was released from prison and was soon elected to Algeria's first National Constituent Assembly.

In 2013, Zohra Drif published her book "Inside the Battle of Algiers: Memoir of A Woman Freedom Fighter", in which she narrates her early life and time in the Algerian resistance to French colonial rule. She justifies her involvement in the armed struggle during Algeria's war of independence as the only option.

Zohra Drif also served as a senator in Algeria's Council of the Nation from 2001 to 2016.
